Washington won again yesterday, and all on account of a blunder by Holmes, the Tigers' right fielder, who can take the entire responsibility for his team's defeat. Holmes' muff and the efficient service rendered by Case Patten in the center of the diamond gave the locals the game in the second round, for after three Manningtons walked around the four-base circuit in that inning they could not get a man across the plate.

When the Tigers came on the diamond Jimmy Manning stepped in for the pitcher, and, dipping down deep into his tank and fishing out a few good ones, he decided that it would be wise to pit a good south-paw slaw artist against the Wolverines, who suited a trifle too much of twirlers and directed them to take their seats on the bench, and after reciting "Ene, meny, minny, mo" over several times, the last syllable being counted on Case Patten, Jimmy told Patten that he was "it." Jimmy reminded the south-paw that he had said "Satan had taught left-handed people to use the wrong hand," and he told Case if that individual had taught him to do any stunt with a south paw he should kick his memory and bring every one of them into practice.

Patten promised to bring all of his tricks into the game, and took his stand on the rubber with several new ones up his sleeve, which he intended to spring on the visitors in case of an emergency. The Tigers were held down to five scattered hits, none of which did any damage, as they got the first run on Dugan's error and the second on a single to right field, which was suited a trifle too much for Sammy, who parades in that territory.

There were seven misuses accumulated by the Manningtons, two of which netted the Detroiters both their tallies. In the first inning, when a slow one was fired to short, Clingman stopped it, but failed to recover himself in time to cut the runner off at the premier base. This was the first one, but Patten followed shortly with a bad fumble of a ball which struck his glove, and the second runner added another in the sixth when another Tiger bunted, and he began to play football with the sphere in his endeavors to gather in the bunt.

The visitors soon got on to Patten's weakness and tried to him to his surprise, regularly, but after making two fumbles the south-paw concluded that it was about time to draw the line. Mercer also secured two errors by dropping balls that were difficult to hold, as he had to reach out several feet for them. Farrell was credited with an error when he hit a base-runner in throwing to first to complete a double play. The spheroid bounced over near the place where the people who pay 25 cents to say rude things to visitors, and Mercer, who gave graceful chase, was unable to get his digits until a man had skeddaddled across the finish line.

But the worst of all was the one that was chucked up to Dugan. Sammy must have been thinking of the cigar shop, for the miscreant was one of the most inexcusable fumbles seen lately, and allowed the Detroiters to score one more run than they were entitled to. McAllister got to the initial base on an error by Mercer, and Roscoe Miller, the Tiger's twirler, came to the front and singled to right garden. The ball bounced directly into the cigar shopkeeper's hands, and a valiant player would undoubtedly have picked it up, but he was not the case with Dugan. He threw up his paws as if to gather it in, but his calculation was a way off and the ball rolled to the fence with the fielder in hot pursuit. He recovered it after McAllister had crossed the terminal, and when he came in to take a swat at the leather he was given the hard thrown-down, the frozen fist, the frigid frown, and several other fair-look evidences of displeasure.

McAllister, who looked after the visitors' interests in the box, and whenever he does the twirling it is good-bye to him, for the lad has some very difficult shots. Such was not the case yesterday, for the Manningtons lit on his delivery with the precision with which the officials carry fly lights on a bald head, and but for the good support the pitcher received from the outfielders there would have been several more runs made off his delivery. When the game was over Miller felt as much relieved as papa does when he has passed off his son's last chorus girl entertainment.

The game was listless up to the third inning, when the fun started for the Senators. Coughlin stepped up to the bat, and he picked out one of Miller's drops and rapped it over the second baseman's head. Case Patten was next on the list and after doing a war dance around the plate he finally drew a free pass to first. Waldron, who was taking no chances of a Tiger getting under his hit, threw himself together and waxed out to right field, where Holmes fumbled it, and Coughlin, Patten, and Waldron beat a path around the circuit. This was the last the Senators saw of the strike, for they were unable to get a man across it during the remainder of the matinee.

In the seventh the Senators had a large chunk of luck. The Tigers had landed three of their number on the sacks and had sent Holmes, one of their best strategists, to the plate to put a pucker in the eye of the horsehide. Holmes, being anxious to make good, hit the first one that was tossed over and lined a hot one to Farrell, who held on to it like grim death and fired it over to third, where a runner was caught off the base. This performance was quite a relief to everyone present and when Farrell traigned in he received the lion's share of applause and was compelled to doff his sky piece several times in order to satisfy the bleachers.

The Tigers are slated to furnish the sport and excitement for the Detroiters and Mercer will probably be sent in to capture the last game of the season with them. The game, however, commences tomorrow shows the part that each man played in yesterday's matinee:

TAIL-ENDERS EASY PREY.
The Superbas Have No Trouble Defeating the Reds.
CINCINNATI, Sept. 25.—The Brooklyn Superbas today won over the Cincinnati Reds in a game that was much abused tail-enders today. The Reds were as powerless before Donovan as they were before Hughes and Kison in the two preceding days. Heisman, an amateur of local fame, started in to pitch, but in the second inning he was felled by one of Donovan's swift inshoots which struck his temple. This forced his retirement, although not seriously injured. Four runs were made off him in two innings, but these were founded on errors by his supporters. Southoff replaced him in the third inning, but he was felled in the fourth by a single to right field. The game was touched up for four singles in the fifth for a cluster of five tallies. The score:
